

HAVE YOU ANY OF THESE

Symptoms of a Very Common Trouble!

There is no disease so common in the United States as catarrh because it appears in so many forms and attacks so many different organs.

It is a common mistake to suppose that catarrh is confined to the nose and throat. Any inflammation of the mucous membrane wherever located is catarrh. Catarrh of the stomach or bladder, or intestines is nearly as common as nasal catarrh and much more serious although it is true that stomach catarrh and catarrh of other internal organs is the result of neglected nasal catarrh.

A new remedy has recently appeared which so far tested seems to be remarkably effective in promptly curing catarrh, wherever located. The preparation is sold by druggists under the name of Stuart's Catarrh Tablets, and in addition to being very palatable and convenient, possesses extraordinary merit, in many cases giving immediate relief from the coughing, hawking and constant clearing of the throat and head, those symptoms with which everyone is familiar who has ever suffered from colds in the head and throat.

Catarrh is simply a continuation of these symptoms until the trouble becomes chronic and grows gradually from year to year.

Stuart's Catarrh Tablets are composed of Hydrastin, Eucalyptol, Gualiac and similar antiseptics and catarrh specifics, from which it will be seen that no secret is made of the ingredients and also that no mineral poisons are used, as is the case with many well known catarrh medicines.

For catarrh of the nose, throat, bronchial tubes, for catarrh of the stomach, intestine or bladder no preparation is so safe and gives such rapid and permanent result as Stuart's Catarrh Tablets.

All druggists sell them at 50 cents for full sized packages. You can use them with assurance that you will not contract the cocaine or morphine habit as the results from this catarrh cure are apparent from the first day's use.

For His Wife's Sake.

"Don't let Henrietta hear you allude to her as my better half," said Mr. Meekton behind his hand to the friend who had come to dinner.

"I understand. The expression is a trifle commonplace, not to say plebeian."

"It isn't that. But I wish you'd choose another fraction. It would annoy Henrietta vastly to have you think she was less than four-fifths at the lowest calculation."—Washington Star.

Why She Blushed Unseen.

"I heard that young man who calls on Sister Rose quoting poetry about her name last night," said the bad boy.

"Blush!" exclaimed Sister Rose.

"What did he say?" asked the bad boy's equally bad brother.

"He said something about many a flower being born to blush unseen," answered the bad boy.

"He must have been kissing her in the dark," suggested the bad boy's brother.—Chicago Post.

Economy in Boston.

Sprocket—Do you ride as much as you used to?

Crunker—No; don't have to. Have found out an easier way. Instead of riding 50 miles on Sunday for a record, I just make my record now by lying in bed.

It is so much easier and very much cheaper.—Boston Transcript.

Love That Took
Fright at a Face

He was my master and his bonds were not, however, by any form of indenture, but by love. Moreover, he loved me, albeit he was blind and I his housekeeper's daughter.

That is, he loved my voice—the rare voice that is like delicious music even to my ears—the rare voice that heaven gave me in compensation for my ghastly face.

That face! That face! How I have cursed it! How I have cursed the hour that I was born!

He was my master in more ways than one. He was a violinist of marvelous power. Playing was the delight of his life, and when I was only a child he conceived the idea of teaching me and forthwith proceeded to carry the thing into effect.

A passionate lover of music, I proved an apt pupil and, after years of loving, patient application, developed a power as marvelous as his own. What strains we wailed from those two violins, at least 100 years old! It seemed as if the melody of heaven had found their way to earth under the inspiration of our touch, and, oh, how the love burned to our hearts! Ah, what memories these are!

But I may not linger. One glorious day I was called to him and, following my ghastly face against his breast, murmured tenderly:

"My darling, my love, when is it to be?"

"My master!" I half whispered in tremulous inquiry, a sweet joy at my heart, for I well knew his meaning.

"My darling," he went smilingly on, with his tender kisses and tender caresses.

"My darling, must you be an outcast beforehand? Cannot Mrs. Estelle Vaughn purchase it as well as Miss Estelle Rial?"

"My master," I tremulously murmured again.

"My darling, I want my wife," he continued with a certain vehemence. "I want her tomorrow. Will she give herself to me?"

So when the morning rose I became Mrs. Estelle Vaughn. Delicious memory!

A month passed—a month of perfect bliss for both. At the end of that month there was an arrival at the old hall. It was the proud, neglected sister whom I had never seen and Ralston little expected to meet again. She had accidentally learned of his marriage and came to inspect the bride.

"Good heavens!" she exclaimed when he called me to him and tenderly presented me.

"Good heavens! Ralston, you must create to tell me that this hideous-looking creature is your wife, and a messianic at that!"

"You forget yourself, Marlon," he haughtily replied, "and"

But I, though my heart was on fire, interposed in my unskillful tones:

"The countess is right, dear husband; I am no beauty, as I have often assured you."

"My darling," he exclaimed, with passionate vehemence, as he took me in his arms, knowing well how my poor heart was aching. "You have assured me of more than that; you have declared your love to me, and that is all I need. But what care I, my darling? It is the gem that I love, not the perishable beauty of the casket."

The countess rose and shrugged her shoulders, remarking as she did so:

"It's well that you are blind, Ralston." With that she retired, but the same morning she wrote and posted a letter to Paris, and in the course of a week there was another arrival.

The countess received this guest alone and then, without ceremony, brought him to the music room, where Ralston and I were luxuriating in the heaven of delicious sounds. That was the first intimation we had of his arrival or his errand.

"Ralston," said the countess after the necessary introductions—"Ralston, this gentleman is the most eminent oculist of his day, and I have sent for him, hoping that 20 years of blindness may end in your seeing once more, and I think I may safely say that I have never known a man who needed his sight so much as you."

A malignant glance at me gave venomous point to the remark.

And that day she wrote another letter, and soon there was in reply another arrival, this time a fair, sylphlike creature, beautiful as a dream.

I looked at her and shuddered.

Heavens, how I suffered! But why do I linger over all this? Enough that the day came when he saw for the first time in 20 long years. Just before the handgaze was to be removed a peremptory summons called me from the room, whispering to the oculist to wait till my return. I hurried away.

But such was not the countess' design. I returned just in time to hear my husband's cry of delight as his eyes rested on the beautiful Lulu, who had been placed conspicuously in front of him and to see him snatch her in a passionate embrace to his heart. I sprang forward, wallowing mournfully:

"Oh, Ralston! Ralston, she is not your wife!"

At the sound of my musical tones he pushed her roughly from him and turned with glowing countenance toward me.

He turned back but that was all. Words were not needed. Dismay, horror, repulsion and disgust were depicted only too legibly on his handsome features. Reeling to him, I sobbed as I sank at his feet and clung to his knees:

"I told you the truth, Ralston! I told you the truth!"

"Yes, yes, I know," he groined, covering his face with his hands and dropping shudderingly into his seat. "But I was unprepared for this. Would to heaven I had kept my blindness and my happiness."

It was useless. His heart had gone to the beautiful Lulu, and gradually the music began to madden my soul—gradually, gradually, till a certain morning, when I sprang like a tigress at his throat.

That brought the end. They took me to a madhouse. Then followed a wedding in which Lulu figured as a bride, then my broken hearted mother's death. The countess had won the game. The meal-lance was at an end.

Is it wonderful that the violin still has power to temporarily madden me?—New York News.

WENT UNDER A LADDER.

And Superstition Only Became More

A local newspaper man forgot his usual caution the other day and walked under a ladder.

He couldn't very well avoid walking under the ladder, because it slanted directly across the way.

Ordinarily, he goes around ladders or climbs over them or waits for the ladder man to come back and take the ladder down.

This time he walked under it.

Nothing happened out of the common for an hour or two.

Then somebody stole his umbrella and he had to walk to the car in the rain.

When he stepped off the car, he didn't notice that there was a second step, and so got a decidedly unpleasant
